Achelôus, ôi. m. A famous riv- er of Epyre in Greece, rising out of mount Pindus, and dividing Ætolia from Acarnania; hod Pachicolum. The poets give it a person, and say he was the son of Oceanus and Tethys; or of the Sun and Earth, as some say, whom Hercules engaged in single combat for Deianira, daughter to the king of Calydonia, to whom both had pretensions, and conquered him, though he changed himself first into a serpent, then into a bull; in which form, having lost one of his horns, he was obliged to compound for it by giving Hercules the horn of plenty (Vid.
Amalthæa) for it, at last changed himself into a river. The meaning of the fable is, that this was a great river, therefore fitly called the son of Oceanus. That it had many turnings and windings, therefore fitly expres'd by a serpent. The roaring noise which it maketh when it overfloweth its banks, and whereby the adjacent fields become fruitful, answer well to the labours and roaring of a bull; under which figure therefore the poets frequently describe rivers.
The two streams, or channels which it had, are the two horns in the fiction; one of which branches, being dammed up by Hercules to prevent its spoiling the country, is described by the cutting off one horn; and the fruitfulness which thereupon succeeded, is the fabulous horn of plenty, Mythol.

One of the Cecropes, brother to Pasipha, both very affronting to every body they met. Their mother bade them take heed of meet-tail: Upon a time, they finding Hercules asleep under a tree, set upon him and abused him; but he having caught and bound them, tyed them on his club, and carried them on his back like a brace of hares. They, as they hung with their heads downwards, espying Hercules's backside all black and hairy, one said to the other, Did not our mother warn us of meeting Melampyrgus? Hercules overhearing them, and being taken with the conceit, fell a laugh-Synephon. Achilli, Vir. (q. ab primæ simpl. The son of Peleus king of Thessaly, and Thetis, the goddess of the sea. His mother dipped him all over, when he was a child, in the river Styx, to make him invulnerable, except that part of his foot which she held him by when she dipped him. He was put to the tuition of Chiron the Centaur, to learn to ride the great horse, and to play upon musick, Vid. Stat. in fin. Ach-chill. His mother was warned by the oracle, that if he went to the wars of Troy with other princes, he should be slain there; wherefore she sent him away in woman's apparel, and procured he should ly hid amongst the daughters of Lycomedes, where he got with child one of his daughters called Deidamia, of whom was born Pyrrhus; but it being prophesied, that unless Achilles did help, Troy could not be conquered, Ulysses by craft found him out. He had certain armour made by Vulcan, at the request of Thetis, which could be pierced by no human force. Out of peevishness for Agamemnon's taking away Briseis from him, he forbore fighting a great while, till the death of his friend Patroclus; to revenge which he went again to battle, slew Hector, and dragged him at his chariot thrice about the walls of Troy, and afterwards sold his body to his father king Priam for a great sum.

Concerning which Ennius writ a tragedy, called Hectoris Iytra, a we learn from Statius, Sylv. 2, 7, 55. At last he was slain by Paris, being shot in the heel.

Amalthea, æ. f. [Ἀμάλθεια, ab ἀμαλθεῖω, multiplico, nutrio] The nurse of Jupiter. Meliſſus king of of Crete had two daughters, Amalthea and Melissa, who fed Jupiter when a child, with goats milk and honey. Some say, that the name of the goat was Amalthea, and reign, that when the was dead Jupiter head her, and made his Ægis of her skin, from which he had the name of Ægis. Jupiter for her good services afterward made her a star, and gave one of her horns to his two nurses, when he was come of age; imparting to it this virtue, that the horn should supply every thing they wished for. Ovid says, that Amalthea was the nymph who nursed him, and that the goat by accident breaking off her horn against a tree, she filled it with flowers and fruits, and put it to Jupiter's mouth; for which he turned her into a star, and honoured the horn with the name of Plenty. Ἀμαλθείης πέγης, Prov. Pleno copia cornu, Hor. Epist. 1, 12, 29. though Ovid applieeth that too to the horn of Achelous, which Hercules broke off. It is remarkable, that the septuagint have translated קְהָלֵךְ Job's youngest daughter's name by Ἀμαλθείης πέγης. Some also gave their books of miscellanies this title, of which number was Phocion the peripatetic.

Ammon, is. m. A name of Jupiter whose temple was in the deserts of Libya, for which reason some have derived it from Ampis, arena; but the name not being Greek, but purely Egyptian, as Plutarch, as well as Herodotus in Euterpe affirm, it seemeth more probable to derive it from אמן the fun, under which name Macrobius hath shewn Jupiter to be worshipped. This is farther confirmed by the manner of his worship, which was under the form of a ram, whence he is stiled corniger. For the word אמן signifieth both an horn and a ray of light.

His oracle was in reputation in the time of Alexander the Great, but began to be neglected in the reign of Tiberius, as Strabo, who then lived, telleth us, and more in the time of Trajan, as we learn from Plutarch's treatise of oracles, and more and more despised as the light of the Gospel shined clearer.

But afterwards being with child by Jupiter, she was suspected by Dirce, whom Lycus had married, to be still familiar with her husband, who therefore ordered her to be cast into prison; from whence she was delivered by Jupiter, and fled into the mountain Cithæron; and there, in a place where two ways meet, brought forth twins, which were educated by the shepherds as their own. They called one of them Zethus, ἀδελφὸς ἑταίρου, and this other Amphion, ἀδελφὸς ἑταίρου ἐταίρου. When they were grown up, and understood the injuries done by Dirce to their mother, they tied her to the tail of a mad bull, which dragged her on the cragged rocks, till Bacchus pitying her, turned her into a mountain of the same name. Amphion became an excellent musician, having been presented with a lute by Mercury, on which he played so sweetly, that he brought the stones together where-with the tower of Thebes was built, Hor. A. Poet. 394. & Sil. 11, 445. By thus receiving a lute from Mercury is meant, that he was a very eloquent man; and by his bringing the stones together, that he persuaded the rude and barbarous people to join together into one body, and pursue one common interest, building themselves a city, wherein to live together under certain laws agreed upon by common consent, and fortifying a tower as a defence against their enemies.

Accordingly when he was of age, he passed over into Spain, beat the Gauls at the river Rhodæ, then marched his army over the Alps, vanquished Sempronius the Roman consul at Trebia, routed the consul Flaminius at Trasimene, and though worsted a little by the conduct of Q. For being tribune, he left the city privately, and fled into Gaul to Cesar. He invaded the province of Brutus, and by the persuasion of Tully the senate voted him an enemy to the republic. He was beaten by the two consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and young Cesar; but long after he joined in a league with Octavius and Lepidus, and so their government was called a triumvirate. Immediately upon this he vanquished the forces of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in Macedonia. He divorced his wife Fulvia, to marry Octavia sister to Octavius. For the love he bore to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, he slighted her also, which Octavius resenting made war upon him, overcame him in a seafight at Actium, and forced him to flee to Alexandria, where, being besieged by Cesar, in despair he fell on his own sword.* (1) Vid. It was anciently called Lygos, Plin. 4, 1. and hath had several names since. Constantine the Great, when he made it the seat of the empire, would have had it called Nova Roma; but Constantinople from his own name prevailed, and is still in use, only the Turks, since it came into their power, call it Stampolin.

[lic dict. qu. Ceres, a gerendis frugibus, Varr. vel a ceteo, pro quo nunc dicimus creo, Serv. qu. frugum creatrix] The daughter of Saturn and Ops, the goddess of corn and tillage. She had by Jupiter one daughter, named Proserpina, whom Pluto privately enticed away, and took with him into his infernal kingdom. Ceres missing her, and not knowing what was become of her, lighted torches on mount Aetna (which they say, hath burnt ever since) and sought for her all the world over; in her travels she came to king Eleusius, and undertook the tuition of his son Triptolemus. When he was come to age, she provided him a chariot drawn with winged dragons, that he might travel through the world, and teach people husbandry, who lived before on acorns, and other natural productions of the earth. Afterward hearing that her daughter was carried away by Pluto, she went to Jupiter, and complained to him of the injury done her. Jupiter granted that she should return back, upon condition she had tasted nothing in hell whilst she was there; but it being proved by the witness of Ascalaphus, that she had eaten some of a pomegranate, as she walked in Pluto's orchard, all hope of return vanished; wherefore, in revenge, she turned Ascalaphus into an owl. Cicero, onis. m. Mark Tully Cicero, father of the Latin eloquence, the greatest orator that ever the Roman state bred, or employed. He was born at a mean town in Italy called Asipum, but the greatness of his genius soon made him taken notice of, so that making easy steps through the lower honours, he was admitted into the chair of state. He acquitted himself in his consulship so well, that he was the first who ever was honoured with the glorious title of father of his country. He was a great lover of the state, and an unwearied defender thereof; Catiline's conspiracy, and the Agrarian law are ample testimonies of his vigilance and industry. He was banish'd the city by Clodius at that time tribune, against whom he made that incomparable speech for Milo; but was with honour restored. In the civil wars he took part with Pompey, as thinking the public liberty lay on that side, to which he always to his last breath shewed himself a constant friend. He had one son, unworthy of such a father, to whom when he was a young student at Athens, he sent his book of Offices, a book which gave the first handfell to the invention of Printing in Europe. He acquitted himself in his consulship so well, that he was the first who ever was honoured with the glorious title of father of his country. He was a great lover of the state, and an unwearied defender thereof; Catiline's conspiracy, and the Agrarian law are ample testimonies of his vigilance and industry. He was banish'd the city by Clodius at that time tribune, against whom he made that incomparable speech for Milo; but was with honour restored. In the civil wars he took part with Pompey, as thinking the public liberty lay on that side, to which he always to his last breath shewed himself a constant friend. He had one son, unworthy of such a father, to whom when he was a young student at Athens, he sent his book of Offices, a book which gave the first handfell to the invention of Printing in Europe. He had a brother too, Quintus Cicero, once Caesar's lieutenant general in Gaul, afterwards proconsul in Asia. He was slain by order of Mark Anthony in the sixty third year of his age. Vide vitam ejus apud Plutarchum.

[α δαίμων, scio; vel δαιδάλλω, vario, Fest.] An Athenian artificer, the most ingenious in the world, whence the proverb, Dædalis opera when we would commend a thing for the curiousness of the work; he invented the saw, the ax, the plummet, the augour, glue, cement, sails for ships, the sail-yard; and statues so contrived as to make the eyes move, as if living; being accused of the death of Perdix his nephew, he fled into Crete, and there made the Labyrinth, into which Minos put him and his son Icarus, because he had made a cow of wood, wherein Paphæ putting herself, became guilty of monstrous leudness. He seeing no way of escape, desired feathers and wax, to make a present, as he pretended, for the king, but therewith he made himself and his son wings, and so flew from Crete to Sardinia, and from thence to Cretæ, where having lost his son by the

the way, he built a temple to Apollo. The meaning of the fable is, that Dædalus being privy to the adultery of Pasiphaë, the wife of Minos, with his servant named Taurus, was cast into prison with his son Icarus; but they, and some other discontented persons flying from Crete in some small vessels, Minos pursued them so briskly, that the ship in which Icarus was, split against the rocks: but Dædalus having found out the use of sails, and the king using oars only, got first to Sicily, and so escaped the fury of his pursuer; whence the proverb, Remigis Dædalici, to signify a thing done with dexterity and speed. *Vid. [ab οἶδω, tumeo, & οἶδω, pes, quod tumentes haberet pedes, nempe perforatos, quod ex arbore penderet, cum pastori à patre occidendus traderetur] A king of Thebes, the son of Laius and Jocasta. His father learning from the oracle that his son should slay him, gave orders to a shepherd to kill him; who cruelly hung him, with an ozier twig put through his feet, on a tree to perish with hunger. But it happened that the huntsman of Phorbas king of Corinth coming that way found him, and carried him to the queen, who brought him up as if he had been her own. When he was grown up, understanding he was not her son, he went in quest of his parents. Coming to Phocis, he killed his father unwittingly in a mutiny. Thence going to Thebes, he ignorantly married his mother, and had children by her. Afterwards finding himself guilty, though ignorantly, of parricide and incest, for grief he plucked out his own eyes, and was led about by his daughter Antigone. Fabulam habes ap. Orpheus, i. & eos, m. A Thracian, the son of Oeagrus, or, as others, of Apollo and Calliope; a most ancient, learned, and excellent poet. He was one in the Argonautic expedition, whereof he wrote the history; which, together with his hymns, &c. is still extant, but whether genuine, is much doubted. They are, without doubt, of good antiquity, but seem to be writ by several persons, and at different times. The poets feign the woods and hills to follow him, as charmed by his lute, and rivers to stop their course, that they might hear his music; the meaning whereof is, that by his wisdom and eloquence he reduced the barbarous people to civility, as explained by Horace, A. Poet. 391. There are several others of this name found in Suidas; but Cicero, out of Aristotle, saith there never was such a man as Orpheus, and that the Orphicum carmen was made by a Pythagorean, one Circeps, N. D. 1, 38. The sad story of his wife Eurydice's death, and his descent into hell, fee pleasantly sung by the divine Maro, in the latter part of the last Georgic.

Pan, panis. m. The god of shepherds, banters, and all other country exercises. Mythologists thought the universal nature of things to be signified by him, as his name seemeth to import.

Whose son he was, is not agreed among them. Homer maketh him the son of Mercury, and saith that he was called Pan from flav, omne, because he charmed all the gods with his flute; others say that he was the son of Demogorgon, and first invented the organ, of seven unequal reeds joined together; the manner thus: Having on a time fought with Cupid, that god in spite made him fall in love with the coy Nymph Syrinx, who fleeing from him by the banks of Iadon, a river of Arcadia, at the instant prayers of the Nymphs was turned into a reed, as her name in Greek signifieth, which the god, grasping instead of her, made a pipe of it, and for his music was adored by the Arcadians. The most common opinion was, that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope. But Nat. Comen, out of Duris Samius, maketh his birth scandalous, saying he was called flav, because begot by all Penelope's fluters. He was painted half man, half goat, having large goats horns, a chaplet of pine on his red face, a pleasant laughter, with the feet and tail of a goat, a motley skin covering his body, with a crooked stick in one hand, and his pipe in the other; see him nicely described by Sil. Ital. 13, 328, & segg. a light enough to fright women and children, yea, armed men too. For when Brennus the Gaul was about to pillage the temple of Apollo at Delphos, he by night struck such a terror in his army, that he quitted his sacrilegious design; hence Panisti terrores. Yea, as homely as he was, he pleased the goddess Luna, turning himself easily into a white ram, Vir. Geor. 1, 302, & deinceps; and the Nymph Dryope also, almost putting off his divinity, and turning shepherd for her sake. Neither was he displeasing to other Nymphs, who are generally made dancing round about him, to hear the charms of his pipe. The usual offerings made him were milk and honey, in shepherds wooden bowls; also they sacrificed to him a dog, the wolf's enemy, whence his usual epithet avocis, whence also his priests were called Luperci. His festival was celebrated Feb. 15th by the Romans, brought into Italy by Evander the Arcadian, and revived afterwards by Romulus, in memory of his preserver. He was also called by the Romans Junus, ab incundo. Vir. Lir. 1, 5. Macrob. Sat. 1, 22. & Serv. in An. Vir. 6, 75. The ancients, by giving so many adjuncts and attributes to this idol, as before hinted, seem to have designed him for the symbol of the universe; his upper parts being humane, because the upper part of the world is fair, beautiful, and smiling, like his face; his horns symbolize the rays of the sun and of the moon; his red face the splendor of the sky; the spotted skin, wherewith he is clothed, the stars, which bespangle the firmament; the roughness of his lower parts, beasts, and vegetables; his goats feet, the solidity of the earth; his pipe, compact of seven reeds, the seven planets, which they say make the harmony of the spheres; his crook, bending round at the top, the years circling in one another, Serv. interpr.

D. 3. rectius, puto, a $\Sigma\alpha\tau\upsilon\rho$ abscōditus, quod in Italia lateret, unde & Italia Latium a latendo, vel a Saturno, Celt. fortis] The son of Coelus and Terra, or Vesta, whom some call his daughter; or, as Plato, of Oceanus and Tethys. He married Ops, or Rhea, his own sister. His elder brother Titan was prevailed upon to assign over his right to him, which he did on this condition, that Saturn should destroy all his male children, that so the kingdom might return to Titan's posterity; which Saturn performed, devouring the males as soon as born. But when Jupiter and Juno were born, Ops gave him a stone wrapt up like a child to devour, which he did; and by some such device saved Neptune, and Pluto also. Titan hearing of this made war upon his brother, subdued him, and threw him into Tartarus, whence he was delivered by his son Jupiter. But, notwithstanding, having learned by the oracle that his son should dethrone him, he laid wait to kill him. But Jupiter having notice of it was beforehand with him, surprized him, made him drunk, bound, and gelt him, as he with his scythe had served his father Coelus, vid. Apoll. Arg. 974. Being loosed he fled, and hid himself in Italy; which from thence was called Latium, a latendo, and the people Latines, Vir. Æn. 8, 319. In his reign the poets fix the golden age, when the earth without culture brought forth every thing. Vir. Ov. Met. 1, fab. 3. Siren, is. sed sep. plur. Sirenes [æ epe, catena, quod quasi vinclos homines tenerent]. Poetical monsters, partly virgins, partly fowls. They lived on the coast of Sicily, and by the sweetness of their voice in singing tempted passengers on shore to their destruction. Some make three of them, others only two. The fable is variously moralized. Plato taketh them for the goddesses of harmony, who tune the spheres; Pausanias for the goddesses of eloquence in all kinds. Hence Iocastes in his epitaph was called Siren, and Valerius Cato Latina Siren. Others, and with greater shew of reason, make pleasures the moral, pretending to account for their number, how they are three, from hence, because they comprehend all pleasure in eating, drinking, and venery, Plato & Aristot. but these exclude the highest pleasures, those of the mind; nor doth their account take in even animal pleasures. Socrates, is. m. (1) The son of Sophroniscus, a stone cutter of mean fortune, and Panarete a midwife; an Athenian philosopher, the wisest man living in his time, in the judgment of the oracle of Apollo. Quinilian calleth him the fountain, as Lucy, before him, the prince of philosophers. He was master to Xenophon and Plato, from whom we have an account of him; for he left nothing in writing. He taught his scholars gratis. He was chiefly studious in Ethics, the most useful branch of philosophy. In his advanced age he was ridiculed by Aristophanes, accused by Anytus, a rich man, Melites, a poet, and Lycon, an orator, of contemning the gods, and endeavouring to introduce a new religion, because he said he had a genius, with whom he advised in all his affairs. Whereupon he was condemned to die, and with a serene countenance drank up his cold poison, giving precepts of virtue during all the time of its operation. But after his death the Athenians shewed their repentance, by putting to death his accusers; so true is that of the poet, Virtutem incolumem odimus, sublatam ex oculis querimus invidi. (2) A painter who drew the Graces at Athens; also Ocnus twisting his rope, and the ass standing by to devour it. (3) An historian of Rhodes. (4) An historian of Constantinople, who wrote the history of the church in Greek, from the time of Constantine to that of Arcadius.

Xenophilus, i. m. A physician, who lived an hundred and five years without any sickness. Plin. 7, 50.

Xenophon, ontis. m. A scholar of Socrates, eminent for religion, justice, and all moral and civil virtues; neither did he less excel in the military art, being a very good commander. He was very well respected by the younger Cyrus, who gave him a military command; under the character of whose education he draweth the image of a perfect and every way accomplished prince, in eight books, in a most sweet and natural stile, without the least affectation, as is evident, because, as Fabius observeth, no affectation can reach it, lib. 10, 1. Hence that of Cicero, Xenophontis voce Musas quasi locutas ferunt, in Orat. c. 19. He wrote several other things, as particularly the sayings and acts of Socrates, &c.

Xerxes, is. m. A king of Persia, the son of Darius. He was a very haughty prince, but very weak and unsuccessful. The war with the Athenians begun by his father he prosecuted, invading Greece with 700,000 men of his own kingdoms, and 300,000 auxiliaries, and 12,000 ships. But this so great and powerful an army wanted a commander; for the king who should have led them on, was always last in the field, and first in the flight. He was first opposed at Thermopylae; Leonidas king of Sparta, with 4000 men, endeavoured to hinder his landing, which they did for several days, cutting off vast numbers of their enemies, but at length wearied with slaughter, they all fell. Upon which he marched to the city, burnt it, and several others which were empty of inhabitants. Themistocles having overcome him in a sea fight, from which he fled in a fisher's boat, afterwards perfected the liberty of Greece more by policy, than his arms. Vid. Just. 2, 12, & seq. Nep. in Themist. & Herod. lib. 7.
